Chapter Four

The Strings That Remember

The guitar sat in your hands like it had been waiting for you.

Most people pick up an instrument and spend weeks – even months – learning how to hold it properly, how to make their fingers press the strings just right.

But you?

You had it singing in hours.

I remember showing you the basics – a few chords, a little rhythm – and you soaked it all in like you'd known it before.

Your fingers found their places, your hands moved with ease, and before long you were strumming like you'd been doing it your whole life.

That's the gift you've always had – that mind of yours, quick and sharp, able to take something new and make it your own almost instantly.

Not everyone gets a brain that works like that.

It's rare,

it's powerful, and it's yours.

And here's something important: gifts like that don't disappear.

Even if life feels heavy, even if the days are long, that quick mind is still inside you, ready to light up the moment you find something you love to learn again.

Strings remember the songs they've played before – and so do you.
